Goliath
By: Heidi Johannesen Poon

I was higher than the bicycle I rode in a circle until the grass wore away and wouldn’t come back.
I was higher than the hardpan, I thought in the dark, as it lay in a circle: Goliath was in the weeds out beyond the house lights, hiding, and I was flying.
When my chest passed into the unseeable,
Goliath hit me in the pinpoint of my heart, yelling
"Black Dog! White Dog! Yellow Dog!" as if he could pop me out of his mind. But I was trying to give myself a chance to break and win the breathless wishbone of air I’d feel for a few seconds inside me. Isn’t that how you improve your lot? To believe you are only afraid and only ugly, and so thankful that no one inside was having a problem with me or Goliath fighting in that darkened field, and no one was going to get help, or shutting the flood lights off on me either.

About the author

Heidi Johannesen Poon received her MFA in poetry from the Iowa Writers Workshop in 1991. Her writing has been supported by Fellowships from Brown, Iowa, the MacDowell Colony, and the Virginia Commission for the Arts. She published her first chapbook with the Poetry Society of America.

Judge: Maggie Anderson